All SSeries walkbehind floor sweepers have convenient cordless designs with battery power or manual operation. More about NYSETNC. We've all seen them, sweeping up the results of a trim from the bare floor of a hair salon or removing the fries discarded by a toddler on a diner's carpet. Addressing little messes quickly is easy because they're designed to be effective for those kinds of issues. Better than a broom and easier on the budget than a full vacuum, they lift away the fine particles as well as larger crumbs with minimal effort. Because carpet sweepers are so good at so many kinds of cleanups, it's easy to forget they aren't good for high volumes or all spills. Read on to learn about the best carpet sweepers depending on your uses and factors that should play into your decision about which to buy. FloorCritics' best overall unit continues in that tradition, with dual cleaning brushes and four corner brushes feeding your dust and debris into two collection canisters. It is effective on cat litter and food crumbs as well as pet hair that is not ground in. The rollers are effective on solid and carpeted surfaces, even those with deeper cracks, crevices or textured pile. It folds up and stores in minimal space. Other consumers say they've needed theirs daily for years and it's still effective. It shines when sweeping area rugs and on quick pickups around the house, store or office.

For these kinds of cleanups, you want motorized rollers sweeping the area, which is what this Bissell provides. It runs for about an hour before needing a recharge. The dirt container opens with a finger touch. It moves between surface types without difficult transitions. The weakness is corners and edges of baseboards, where small pieces of debris can still linger. If pets are part of your household and you're looking for a quick way to clean up dog food crumbs, cat litter and the associated hairy fuzz they generate, this latest incarnation of a classic will do the job. On short pile, it is easy to move and roll up the dust, and it even works on taller shag or deeper textured rugs. A soft bumper keeps it from scratching furniture you run into it too. This charge action continues with each forward and backward motion. It works equally well in both directions. Some note that they feel it doesn't pick up longer pet or human hair as effectively. If your kids want to help around the house, this could be the unit to give them as it does the job while being just about unbreakable. The model features a low, narrow profile to get under furniture easily. It relies on dual rubber blades to sweep and lift whatever is on the floor. This makes it the best for hard surfaces because of that lift, made more powerful by the ability to move faster courtesy of its power charge. The blades should not scratch delicate flooring or rugs. It works best when the blades are spinning directly over the mess. Made of galvanized steel, this unit seems to live up to its reputation of being a sweeper you can rely upon for many years. This Bissell is designed to cut wide swaths through the mess on your solid surfaces with minimum dust and debris misses. Note that it is not designed for use on carpets; solid floors only. It relies on human power alone to get the job done.

Having a handle instead of a wand is one feature that sets it apart from other machines on our list, helping both in comfort and maneuverability. The large debris tank lets you clean longer between emptying. For large scale, hard surface jobs, this sweeper offers effective cleaning capability without a big price tag. This Shark has motorized brush rollers to keep things moving at a clip fast enough to spin larger pieces into the collection tank. It also offers basic suction to help the cleaning happen faster. Plug it into the transformer when storing to keep it at full charge. The edge blades are designed to help with areas next to counters and walls. Two speed settings allow you to match the cleaning need with the pickup capability. As a bonus, this system is compact to store and hides away until you need it for those sweeping chores. It is a multisurface cleaner and will even pick up sand from hard floors. Emptying the collection tanks over a trash can is easy since they are bottomopening. It also folds flat to take up minimal space in closet storage. You won't mind carrying it to different floors in your house for quick cleaning. Larger messes may require multiple passes to pick up everything. For the price point, it becomes easy to have one handy in many spots in your house or commercial property for fast cleanup. The bottom of the sweeper contains a set of brushes and blades. The blades are for coralling larger debris toward the brushes and brushes to collect dust and dirt. Often, you can adjust the height of the brushes, and as you roll the sweeper, the brushes spin in synchronization courtesy of a belt or interlocking gears. You guide a carpet sweeper with the wand handle attached at the top of the case. For manual models, the faster you move the sweeper back and forth, the quicker the brushes roll and pick up the debris; rechargeable models feature powerassisted brush rolling.

The patrons of your restaurant won't be distracted by someone vacuuming up food fight remains, and the blast of noise won't interfere with the drill at the dentist's office. Okay, maybe something distracting would be a good thing then. Even rechargeable carpet sweepers keep their sound to a low hum. Leaves blowing around a pool deck is a perfect example. Some of us also have craft space in a shed or garage without plugs within reach of a standard vacuum cord. A small amount of suction may also be a feature. Rechargeable units have limited running time. Manual models have more flexibility in terms of where they can go but can be difficult to maneuver and less effective for deeper cleaning. Part of that is due to the fast spin of brush rollers on a vacuum. Because the brushes on a carpet sweeper don't share this fast speed, the power to shoot out something doesn't exist. A perfect cylinder or round object might just continue to roll as you go over it. In those cases, you need a vacuum with tube attachment to make sure you get the pieces. They can pick up dust from wider spaces, making faster work of your cleaning effort than vacuums often can. They also trump brooms in this department. Some are even made with a specific brush designed for tight corners. Emphasizing their different uses isn't enough. Here are the FAQs we hear most often about carpet sweepers as people make their buying decision. For example, a broom can sweep up debris on hard surfaces, though with a broom, you'd then need a dustpan to scoop up the mess. A carpet sweeper puts the debris in an internal container for emptying. In this role, they're more efficient than a broom which can't remove dust or pieces from shallow carpet pile. Plus, they sweep it up, so again, no need for a dustpan. Think of the depth in heavy shag or textured carpet and you'll quickly see why the carpet sweeper isn't designed for them. They don't have the lifting power to pull things from the cracks and crevices in thick carpet.

Brushes pick up dust from carpets or rough outdoors surfaces, while blades gather larger pieces of debris. A potato chip doesn't stand a chance against a carpet sweeper. While most sweepers have a height setting you can change based on hard or soft surfaces, they might not be able to tackle depth. I wouldn't put them up against a ball bearing, either. While people might consider these machines safe for a fabric dog bed, or the sofa a cat likes to use as a bed, they could snag and mar the pile. Ditto for supersoft woods or recently refinished wood floors, where gouging or scouring could occur. The materials they're made of differ, machine to machine. Blades are usually made of rubber or another soft but strong material that won't scratch hardwood or carpet. Manmade might last longer, but some buyers would prefer to use less plastic and worry these bristles will be too coarse for their sensitive floor surfaces. Natural materials might raise issues about animal testing. However, the head of the unit may shift without much effort but twisting motions could be difficult. That means you can't direct the cleaning as easily as you like. Of course, these same issues exist with vacuums. The best defense to keep a carpet sweeper from smelling is to empty it each time you use it. Don't let anything sit in it, even overnight. Many of these canisters are made of plastic, and unfortunately, they are prone to picking up odors if debris is left inside for a length of time. A double bonus comes from knowing your sweeper is always ready to help you tackle that little mess because the dirt canister can take a full load. For the first, buy a regular vacuum. You'll find lists elsewhere on our site with comparisons of vacuums for just about every kind of use. Consider a wetdry vac for wet messes lists available on our site. Smaller models are available for reasonable prices and can also tackle multiple kinds of surfaces.

We've broken the machines down by what use they're best for, based on the following criteria. Motorized sweepers need to be charged. The first is good for light cleaning in between your fullon vacuuming and the second style is better if you have long hair or deeper carpet to conquer. Not all manufacturers make this statistic readily available, so we mention the location and ease of emptying it instead. We list the width to help you find the size that's just right for your needs. If you're tall, find a tool around the house that's easy for you in terms of length and measure it. Compare it to what we list here. We list what you can expect from an empty machine. Ditto on tools to keep things looking great. I feel like I could tell anyone about carpets and carpet sweepers after reading this. That carpet sweeper is still familiar to cleaners today — and you've probably seen something very similar in restaurants or other locations where operators want to clean without disturbing guests with the roar of an electric vacuum. The BG21 sweeper, for example, features corner brushes, a floating head, easy empty dirt bin, comfortable grip and soft rubber wheels that conform to a variety of floor surfaces. Ideal for bare floors and low pile carpet, the BG21 has a 9.5 inch cleaning path and dual debris canisters. While the BG21 is a useful tool year round, it can be especially handy during the winter months when wet debris may pose a slip and fall risk to employees and guests in your facility. It's also the ideal equipment for quickly picking up ice melt left behind by boots. This makes it a convenient choice for grab and go cleaning and allows you to use it in any space, regardless of the number of outlets available. No clumsy cord to drag around means effortlessly moving from space to space, giving you increased freedom when cleaning. Small power vacuums often require belt replacements, and attempting to clean a large space with a small vacuum will mean even more frequent replacements.

Carpet sweepers, by contrast, can take on larger spaces with less maintenance because they don't have belts to replace. Something went wrong.
